In these times when complexity is king and keeping a tight reign on costs is paramount, AP departments are being asked to process an increasing amount of ever more complicated transactions with a reducing number of staff – this will almost inevitably lead to overpayments.

The UK is more prone to this than, for example, the rest of the EU as UK FDs have weighed up the costs of extra staff compared to the cost of overpayments, which are an unknown figure and largely underestimated, and have generally chosen a lower staff level – on average the UK employs 50-60% less AP staff per 1000 transactions than the rest of Europe.

This can, and often does, lead to the use of temporary staff during very busy periods or times where, at short notice, there are high levels of staff absence which raises even higher the potential risk of overpayments.
